Italian prehistoric stone and glass create a vases collection inspired by snails

Using natural materials and following a circular design that centers on a re-use-and-recycle approach, COKI. has created a series of decorative vases inspired by the snail shells. This architectural design is composed of two different materials, both sourced in Italy: a curved glass tube inserted in a circular base of calcarenite (the prehistoric stone of Matera), treated with a new mineral substance (100% natural) developed by COKI studio research.

The names of the vases refer to the life stages of the snails - hence the name Cochleae - and are declined in: Awakening, Development and Liberation, associating each of these phases with different forms, born from the interconnection of the stone and glass components.
